

Fair Share Unpaid

April 16, 2019

The CNN onscreen contributor who snuck debate questions to the Hillary Clinton campaign in advance of the 2016 presidential debates is now a talking head on Fox News.

"I am excited by the opportunity to share my perspective and views with the Fox News audience and to help shape the dialogue at this important juncture in our history," wrote Donna Brazile last month. "More importantly, I'm eager to learn from the experience."

Not a big Fox News fan, me; I don't keep up with personnel changes. Her head just appeared — as a surprise! — onscreen in a Fox News video in my YouTube feed, covering a Bernie Sanders event. She was apparently hired for her campaign expertise — not for her journalism or ethics.

"Everything we believe in as Americans will be examined and, in essence, ratified by our votes," she explained. "But it concerns me, as it does the majority of good Americans, that our national debate has become hostile and disrespectful. We no longer simply agree to disagree. Too often we demonize the intentions of others. Our lines of communication are frayed, if not broken."

Well, one reason for these frayed lines of communication has been all the political and media corruption.

As Brazile demonstrated at CNN in 2016.

She cops, obliquely, to her "fair share of mistakes" in her past career as an activist. "Some would argue I've made more than my fair share," she confessed.

Interesting how insiders in Washington never pay for their mistakes.

Their unfair share.

This is Common Sense. I'm Paul Jacob.
